

Having finally completed our oceanographic stations for the 1965 Arctic Patrol, we sailed the NORTHWIND for Oslo, Norway. We arrived on October 7th and said goodbye to several of the scientists who left to fly back to the States with their reports. The crew wasted no time in getting ashore, once liberty was granted, to "see the sights." Oslo is a very modern city and a majority of the people there speak English. The city was somewhat reminiscent of Copenhagen, so the crew of the NORTHWIND, already fancying ourselves as seasoned world travelers, had no trouble finding places to go and things to see.

OSLO, NORWAY

"Liberty party muster on the pier."
Oslo, here we come.

Mark Lowry takes three Norwegian sailors on a tour through the NORTHWIND.